Wedding, weathered and timeworn certificate, was misappropriate. Which was a bit clear, however, was the date: April 11, 1872.Elocks at a brechtic shop in Bolavia, NC - a small town with a population of less than 200 people - crowded around of the document of almost 150 years of age, which had been hidden in the back of a frame that was donated at the end of July. Framed photo was a girl putting flowers on the dog's collar. The employees were confused. Excluded for the post more newsletter for the most important and interesting stories of Washington's post. They were not only conflicted by how the document traveled from New Jersey - where the wedding license was issued - for a small city of North Carolina, but also wondered why it was hidden behind a Frame first. "Why was he hidden? Was it a forbidden love? Is that maybe a situation in which they secretly wanted to get married? Immediately, my curious mind entered overdrive," said Karmen Smith, executive director of Harbor hoping. Home, a domestic violence program, which operates three thrift shops in Brunswick County. The yields of the stores support the organization.Eniven that the donor of the frame has not received a tax receipt ", we had no information," said Smith, 30. She was determined to dig in the MISTER. "I had a lot questÀpes flowing through my head than me in the £ could just go out alone," she disse.smith. She decided to put an appeal on Facebook. Although the document clearly told only the first names of the couple of New Jersey - William and Katey - she hoped to track her descendants and return the wedding license. "This real treasure and obviously, at a point in time, protected," Smith wrote in the post. "How cool would it be if I could find the family of this couple?! Let's see what we can do!" At the time, "I did not have much confidence that we met relatives," Smith said. But "if nothing else, it would be a fun adventure." It ended up being much more fun than she imagined. Sleuths in social media began to work immediately, and within only a few days, the case of the mysterious marriage certificate had more or less cracked. Although many people extended the clues, a local genealogist stumbled in history, and before long, she started to connect the points.Cornie Knox was at home in Wilmington, NC, when a story about the certificate Wedding of 150 years was highlighted in local news. "Being a genealogist, my ears simply appeared" Knox, 60, said. "I realized that there are enough information to research it. For me, this is a kind of thing of child. I could not resist." Then he began his genealic search, which yielded surprisingly fast results, considering the information she had to begin. Knox started his search at Ancestry.com and names, places and cross-referenced dates that corresponded to faded details on the wedding license. After tracing one of the witnesses in the document, she was able to take some conclusions. "It turns out that the bride and the witnesses were school companions in a school document I met," Knox said, which hosts a YouTube channel called Genealogy Television. "That took me three whole days to really shake properly and write a report to know that I had the right people." She determined that the bride was Katharine Patherine Geworth and her boyfriend was William Tindall Deworth. She was confident that she had found the right couple: "I had to start tracing ahead to find out who the most direct descendant was," Knox said. "That's when I met Irene Cornish." Cornish, 65, was at his house in New York when she spontaneously decided to log on to the ancestral.com. She took her there, she said, "An unusual sést of It was an unusual ethanis of events, "as she does not regularly visit the site.cornish - which is also interested in genealogy - hoped to do some research on her uncle of her big side on the other side of her family. When she realized she had several messages messages Ancestors, including one of Knox. "I could have gone months and I never noticed any of this. It's very dazzling for me," said Cornish, who grew up in the spring of silver, MD. "I do not usually have people contact me through ascendance. ". She expanded in a photo of the marriage certificate and, in the next exam, was able to decipher the full names. "I knew it was my great grandmothers," she said. Considering the date and the fact that it was issued in Bordentown, NJ, "Everything apt". For Cornish, whose name of the middle is Katherine - in honor of her great-grandmother - Knox's unexpected message came "at the perfect time." Her mother died in 2010, and "I was a point where I was feeling kind of isolated and sad because my relatives live in the distance. It seemed that my mother, grandmother and great grandmother were coming in some way. " Beside it, "I've never been able to find out a lot of information about them," she said, adding that only one of her grandmothers was alive when she was born, and she is not in touch with the majority of their distant relatives. Although Cornish does not know much about his maternal grandmother, she knows that her great-grandmother's parents died during the hunger of Irish potato, and that his great-grandmother came from Ireland to the United States when she was 17 and worked as a servant domestic. Meanwhile, Cornish's great-grandmother grew up in Bordentown, NJ, who is where she believes the couple connected.Cornish is not sure why the marriage certificate was hidden, although she suspects that since the boxes Safety were common, an image frame would have been a good place to preserve important documents. She was praised to hear about the existence of the wedding license, and hopes that advertising around helps her connect with distant relatives who may have more information about her lineage.knox organized a zoom call with the Cornish to share his discoveries, and they connected with Smith in the brechtic to organize a date to meet in person, in Cornish's insistence. "For one thing, I did not want to trust so in an old document in the mail, and too, I was so touched that Karmen held out his hand to find a member of the family I wanted to know her And the other people involved, "said Cornish.on August 22, Cornish flew to Wilmington and D. Rove to Brechóº the next morning, where he met Smith and Knox to recover the lost marriage certificate. "It was so exciting to be with Irene. She had a permanent smile on her face," Smith said. "The second certificate was delivered to her; she just broke in tears. The perception that this was Officially in his possession he hit her at once. "In fact, holding the 150-year-old document for the first time" was very overwhelming, "Cornish said. "I'm still in shock that the document even exists, much less than was located and then through this chain of events, I managed to find out about it and actually get it. "Finding the women who helped AAAA gather with a piece of the past of his family" Really touched my heart "It really touched my heart." She said. "They all feel like family somehow." The brechtic gave Cornish the certificate and framed image free. She made a donation to Wait Harbor Home in honor of his great-grandmate, she said. And she also bought a bracelet and necklace from the store.Cornish, who does not It has children, it intends to frame the beloved document and eventually hopes to achieve it to an archiving association or in the History Bordentown society. She also plans to do several copies, as she mailed for all living relatives. connecting Wi th Smith and Knox, and claiming a small legacy dress, she said, has been "an incredible bright spot." She is also a memorable and rewarding experience for Smith. "For anyone else, it's a piece of paper, but for her, it's a part of who she is," Is it over there. "Returning a piece of someone to them is a very cheerful feeling." Related containformer. related.
